

Does the UN really help to solve global problems?

By: Sofia Medina 9R

After the Second World War, a terrible conflict involving more than 30 countries, perhaps 75 million people died, and a lot of countries ended up ruined and without enough resources to survive much longer. As a result of these international battle that proved failure to the League of Nations, the United Nations was created. The UN was founded on 1945 to solve problems that challenge humanity and to promote international co-operation that may help develop and encourage peace all around the world in order to eradicate such conflicts as the Second World War. But, has the UN accomplish its goals? Does it has been useful enough?

Analyzing each of the UN's missions, we can see they have succeeded in much of them. Furthermore, they owe this to the quantity of countries that have contributed in it, as they are now 193 involved. These means they did accomplish most of their goals and it has been useful enough to solve as many conflicts as they have had so far. We may have as an example the 2006 East Timorese Crisis in which the UN gave peacekeeping forces and the UNOTIL opened a refugee camp and housed up to 100 people. On 2006, the UN Security Council helped resolving this conflict. Moreover, the United Nations have also solved problems successfully like this one in more than 50 countries, besides it has alleviate rural poverty in perhaps 97 developing countries and it has fight hunger in almost 50 countries. However they did fail in some of them

<http://www.borgenmagazine.com/10-things-accomplished-united-nations/>